The basis for the increased susceptibility to development of inflammatory lesions in Behcet's disease is not known. We studied the possible role of STAT2 and the IKKgamma subunit of the IKK complex in this disease. We found a reduced expression of IL-4Ralpha and a higher expression of the inhibitory subunit IL-4Rbeta in peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC) of patients with Behcet's disease, as compared with PBMC of healthy controls. We also found, in patients with Behcet's disease, a lower production of IL-12 by TLR-activated PBMC, as compared with PBMC of healthy controls. This alteration was associated with a reduced expression of IL-12p40 and p35, and a higher expression of the inhibitory subunit IL-12Rbeta2. These results suggest that, in Behcet's disease, a constitutive activation of STAT2 and IKKgamma in TLR-activated PBMC leads to inhibition of IL-12 production. These findings may explain the abnormal Th1/Th2 balance present in this disease.. We can't really know if her father is truly her father, for example, because we don't know what became of her mother after the plane crash. We don't know where the survivors ended up and whether they might have been reunited; we don't know how Helen has changed as a result of the experience; and we don't know what the extent of her lost memory is, whether she can remember an accident long enough to have drawn an attachment to the man who rescued her and tried to save her at a cost to his own health (which we'll come
